“The Next Stage of Impact Investing”

Over the past few years the concept of divestment has gained notable support from individuals, businesses, universities and institutional investors. The divestment process aims to make a statement with the absence of financial support to certain industries, but once divested, investors are faced with the question of where and how to re-invest responsibly. This Speaker Series will focus on the changing concept of impact investing, how its strategies are becoming more sophisticated, and how investing can provide social, environmental, and economic benefits, all at once. Join the discussion with our panel of senior level executives to explore the growing space of impact investment.

Matthew H. Brown, Founder of Harcourt Brown & Carey, HB&C

Matthew has worked in the energy finance and policy field for more than 20 years, conducting research, providing environmental, energy and finance consulting, and directing programs that provided non-partisan advice on state clean energy policies, among numerous other roles. He has testified in more than 35 state legislatures as well as in front of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission. In 2005, Matthew moved to Paris, France to begin consulting work with the International Energy Agency, focusing on renewable energy and energy efficiency. Upon his return to Colorado, Matthew built upon his background in a combination of clean energy policy and finance to develop an extensive practice that involves assisting state governments, utilities, lenders, the U.S.

Department of Energy, national associations and others in the area of clean energy finance. Matthew founded HB&C, and advises financial institutions on deployment of capital through loans and leases for clean energy in the western United States as well as nationally.

Patricia J. Rogers, Vice-chair Business Section, Moye White LLP

As an accomplished international business attorney, Trish Rogers utilizes her business and legal background to prepare for all contingencies to best serve her clients. Trish started practicing law in 1997 and is Vice-chair of the firm's Business Section and Co-chair of the firm's Financial Institutions Group. She represents a number of private equity firms and commercial banks throughout the United States. She also works extensively with entrepreneurial companies, focusing primarily on software, sustainability and social media/marketing industries. Trish represents domestic and international companies in the planning, implementation, and execution of mergers and acquisitions, joint ventures, private equity/venture capital financings, technology licensing, distribution agreements, social media issues, data privacy and other general corporate matters. She relies on her extensive business, financial, and legal knowledge to ensure that her clients receive thorough, but practical, legal representation.

Panel Moderator: Ravi Malhotra, President, Triple Bottom Line Foundation

Mr. Malhotra is an experienced engineer and social entrepreneur who has established a variety of sustainable enterprises in India, Africa and the U.S. with an emphasis on sustainable technologies. He has led both award-winning R&D efforts and successful new product launches. Mr. Malhotra holds a Bachelor's degree in Engineering from the Indian Institute of Technology and Master's degrees in both Engineering and Business Administration from the University of Texas at Austin. For the past ten years, he has led ICAST in its programs that have helped hundreds of rural entrepreneurs and businesses with technical assistance, fund raising, marketing, building management teams and creating business strategies. One of these programs include the Triple Bottom Line Foundation, a U.S. Department of Treasury certified Community Development Financial Institution (CDFI), created to take a holistic approach at tackling the affordable housing crisis here in the U.S.
